The lignite, as did the wood of which it is composed, contains a certain amount of resinous matter, and the secret of the pressing of the lignite into briquettes, and its cohesion in that form, is this very resin which is contained in the raw material. The pressure upon the surface of the lignite when in the press is enormous, and develops considerable heat, so much so that the hand can hardly support that of a newly-made briquette. Supposing, for instance, that absolutely dry lignite were sent into the press, the result would be that the heat developed would be so intense as to carbonise the resin in the lignite, and consequently the briquette would have no resistance but would crumble of itself to pieces. In order to obviate this, and to obtain a hard compact briquette,...
