I may be mistaken, but when in the early eighties I was often up and down the stream I have no remembrance of smoke and factories; now the country right through from Belgium and up the whole left bank is seeded with them. Standing on the steamer near Neuwied I counted no less than thirty-two tall smoke-stacks visible at once. It is a remarkable demonstration of the growth and extent of German commercial enterprise. Notwithstanding all this the Rhine has lost none of its charm. Never have I seen the Drachenfels look more majestic, nor the many little towns more beautiful than on this June day. The latter have grown greatly in size during these years and new houses elbow their ancient fellows, but the architects have had the good sense to adapt modern improvements to the beautiful forms of our forefathers, so that the intrusion is not as objectionable as it might be. Even the great factories seem devoid of much of the ugliness that pervades them with us. The curse of the bill-poster is unknown, and the eye is not offended afresh with every change of view. I recently read the severe strictures of Horslev Hinton on the disfigurement of our scenery from this cause, and it is well to freely admit their truth, for only by a recognition of our defects can we hope From the Rhine it is an easy journey to Holland, in fact...
