CHAPTER XXVI SIR FREDERIC CARDEW S TOUR--(continued) We stayed only one night at Kamaror, and the following morning we left by the light of lamps, as we knew from what the chief stated that we had a long day s march before we could reach Kinta Balia, which subsequently proved to be twenty miles distant, with no town or fakai in between. We thought that the previous day s journey had been laborious, but it was as nothing compared to this day s work, for the country was even more mountainous, and the enormous quantity of granite boulders over the surface of the ground was positively bewildering, but withal a marvellous sight. After having travelled for five hours and a half we were thankful to halt for our morning meal under tall trees of exquisite foliage by the side of a stream, over whose rocky bed ran water of crystal clearness, which was indeed most acceptable. We could not, however, afford to remain here long, --forty-three minutes was the time we stopped. Going on we came to a beautiful waterfall about fifty feet wide. At the top it ran over a gentle slope of level granite in deathlike silence, until it fell over in a deep cascade to the broad rocky stream beneath with a deafening roar, churning the water up into a mass of foam. The peacefulness of the upper water gliding along so softly under the intense quiet of the majestic...
