Excerpt: . . . the sitter of a special aspect of life in obedience to mood; as his personality affects the painter--though the instinctive rejection of everything irrelevant that sitter, if we know him, may have come to it. One thing accepted and another let go into our own world in an altogether different from a choice made from within --made, light. Then we have truth to nature, of a that is, by Life itself. For the cast of an profounder order altogether than a mere reflec artists mind is thrown out of the mould of tion of surface. Then we see life as it is mirrored nature like the form of his body. Selections made by temperament are natural, they are Natures own; as they make themselves felt in art they move us with the power of something elemental. They speak for Nature in a way in...
